Our bar and restaurant has for many years been known as Austins, once again picking up on another element of the history of the building. From 1910 to the 1950s, Tullyglass House was owned by a well-known local whiskey distiller James B McAllister. He was a very successful businessman and an early innovator in marketing, for example initially selling all over the British Isles and later, as far afield as North America. Along with a high quality product, he also developed a recognisable brands at a time when many distillers were simply supplying local customers. To reinforce the brands he supplied mirrors and other items to public houses, and also used poster advertising. One of the innovations that he brought to his business was the use of a fleet of branded Austin Seven box vans, built onto the chassis of these small saloon cars. These recognisable vehicles distributed his popular whiskeys throughout the British Isles, and if you care to look at the two Austin Sevens that we have outside, you will get an idea of the task faced by his employees.
